

section focus: project portfolio

Inside story

From a narrow terrace house that appears larger through use of mirrors, to a 670m² penthouse apartment that uses lush fabrics to create a more intimate environment, these projects demonstrate how to create an inviting interior

Front to back

Instead of opting for a typical terrace house conversion, the designer of this home took his cue from the original interior layout

People are often drawn to a home for its character, rather than more practical reasons, such as room size and layout. Dealing with small or awkwardly shaped rooms makes interior design a challenge, but with the right approach, even the most compact home can be transformed into one that feels open and spacious.

This is often the case with traditional terrace houses – they have plenty of character, but they can be difficult do-ups. Their narrow shape, solid walls and lack of light require an innovative design approach. For many architects and designers, the solution has been to gut the interior to create open-plan spaces with a family living area opening out to the rear. But that wasn't a plan that would work for this house, says designer Greg Natale.

"The owners liked the idea of separate spaces, but to provide a living area at the rear would have alienated the front rooms," he says. "It was important to link the entire house, from front to back, which is why there is a direct line of sight from the front door through to the rear."

For this reason, also, Natale says he chose to retain the original layout, keeping the living room at the front of the house, and positioning the kitchen in the middle.

"The kitchen became the hub of the house, having a strong connection to the living area at the front, as well as the courtyard at the rear."

Natale says the original house, which was built in the 1880s, was not only narrow, but also very dark.

"The owners wanted a sleek, minimalist interior with a lot of glass and mirrors, which was an ideal way to create a light, spacious look."

To this end, the right-hand wall of the living area features floor-to-ceiling mirror panelling. This extends from the front door through to the kitchen.

As well as doubling the apparent size of the house, the mirrored wall also reflects light, making the interior bright and airy. White walls further enhance this effect. The floors, however, feature a dark-stained wood, which provides a strong

Preceding pages: Floor-to-ceiling mirrors line one wall of this renovated terrace house, effectively doubling its apparent width, and reflecting light into the formerly dark interior.

Facing page and above: The view from the front door extends through the living and dining rooms, to the kitchen, bathroom and courtyard beyond. While interior walls define each of these spaces, the rooms flow seamlessly.

Left: The living room at the front of the house includes a new gas fireplace with a contemporary, custom-designed Calacutta marble insert.

contrast and helps to visually ground the space.

The kitchen is raised a step up from the front rooms, as it was in the original layout. Natale says it was easier to retain this change of level, which also helps to create a sense of separation.

Like the rest of the house, the kitchen reflects the uncluttered, minimalist theme. The cabinetry features flush, mirrored doors, and where possible, appliances are integrated. A solid, square-shaped island with negative detailing provides an additional work top and storage.

"Minimalism is all about detailing," says Natale. "Every item needs to be carefully considered as it plays such an important role in achieving the overall look. This includes ensuring lines are perfectly straight, which can be difficult in an old home."

Natale chose large pendant lights to add impact to the living and dining areas.

"Using very dramatic, over-scaled pendants was a way to play up the space. There is a very fine line between Facing page: Although an internal room, the formal dining room receives reflected natural light from the front and rear of the house. Over-scale light pendants were chosen to make a strong visual statement. Designer Greg Natale says large items can also make a small space seem larger, while too many small items can emphasise a lack of space.

Above: The kitchen is slightly elevated above the dining room, creating a sense of separation. New stairs to the upper level feature glass balustrading that is in keeping with the materials used elsewhere in the house.

Above: A walkway extends from the kitchen to the courtyard beyond the bathroom. This area features similar travertine tiles to the interior, creating a seamless look between inside and out.

Above right: To maintain the view through the house from the front door to the courtyard, the bathroom is designed to resemble a glass box. The sunken bath and cantilevered basin ensure the fixtures don't interfere with the line of sight.

Facing page, lower: Philippe Starck stools and a retro vintage chair create a colourful outdoor entertaining area.

creating a minimalist interior and a room that is simply boring. Introducing textured elements is another way to achieve the right balance in a minimalist interior."

This was also a reason for the choice of striated travertine for the bathroom floors and walls, he says.

"The bathroom plays a significant role in this house. As it is the last room leading through to the courtyard, it needed to be transparent to retain that line of sight from the front door. For this reason, it is effectively a glass box with louvred walls and everything sunken out of sight – the tub is set into the floor, and the basin cantilevered so the view is not restricted. Using the patterned travertine ensures it is also a visually interesting space."

Access to the courtyard is through large bifolding doors at the side of the kitchen. Philippe Starck stools and a curved, vintage, retro-styled seat add a touch of whimsy to this outdoor entertaining area. Similar travertine tiling links the courtyard with the house, enhancing the sense of a single, large space.

Designer: Greg Natale, Greg Natale Interior Design (Sydney)

Builder: Ciolino Constructions

Kitchen manufacturer: Tusa Brothers

Blinds: Blinds By Bayliss

Tiling: Striato travertine from RMS

Paints: Dulux

Lighting: JSB

Furniture: Eames dining chairs with Eiffel Tower base from Living Edge

Kitchen cabinets: Silver mirror

Benchtops: White Corian

Splashback: Laminex

Oven and hob: Miele

Ventilation: Smeg

Refrigerator and dishwasher: Fisher & Paykel

Bathroom vanity and bath: Duravit

Basin and tapware: Rogerseller

Bathroom flooring and walls: Striato travertine from RMS

Photography by Mark Mawson